Venue: Espace Jacquotte, Rue Haute 139, 1000 Brussels

Lack of decent work is one of the main challenges for the trade union movement today, in the face of economic crisis and a globalisation that is putting pressure on working conditions, wages and social protections worldwide. But is it really possible to achieve decent work for all when governments continue to pursue free trade policies that put the rights of corporations far ahead of the rights of people and the environment?

This conference will explore the links between trade deals and neoliberal policies inside Europe that are undermining basic labour rights and promoting profits for big business at any cost.

Many trade unions are highly critical of free trade policies, most recently seen in the ETUC / TUCA statement in May that strongly condemned the current negotiations with Latin American countries, especially Colombia – notorious as the most dangerous country in the world to be a trade unionist. We will discuss the political opportunities and strategies to stop a deal with Colombia and to tackle trade agreements that threaten workers in Korea, Canada, India and Central America.

As the European Union revises its trade policies, there is a once in a decade chance to push for alternatives to a pure free trade agenda, so that trade helps us to exit the financial crisis in a way that promotes decent work and a social Europe. This conference offers an open space for discussion in the run-up to the next Joint Social Conference in March 2011. Join us and help to take a step towards a new kind of Europe in the world.
